

The majority of respondents (69.2%) agreed/strongly agreed that immigration is generally good for the immigrant sentiment than younger respondents). There was also a statistically significant and fairly strong relationship between negative attitudes toward immigrants and political affiliation, with Republicans reporting the most anti-

College-educated respondents reported significantly less negative attitudes toward immigrants in Hampton Roads, and there was a strong and statistical significant trend showing those in higher incomes households expressing less negative attitudes toward immigrants in the region. That is, generally as household income increased, negative attitudes toward immigrants decreased.
